Federal Reserve Governor Stephen Miran said he will resign from the central bank effective once incoming Chair Kevin Warsh is sworn into office, or shortly before.

Miran also said he's excited about the changes that Warsh plans to make at the Fed, including a shake-up of its communications and balance sheet policies.

Miran, who joined the Fed in September, initially took unpaid leave from his White House job when joining the central bank, before resigning from that post in February. A noted dove, Miran voted for interest-rate cuts in every policy meeting during his period as a policymaker, including dissenting votes urging the central bank to cut by more than fellow officials agreed.
